Back in 1942, a number of people in Oxford met and formed a group- the Oxford Committee for Famine Relief- to help people in other countries. They began with Greece. They collected food and clothes, and sent them to help many poor people in Greece.

World War II came to an end, but the group saw that there was no end to wars and disasters- and the need for their work. So the organization went world-wide and its name became Oxfam. Today, Oxfam runs programmes in over 70 developing countries.

Big successes for Oxfam have included help after hurricanes and other natural disasters. There has been another important aim, too. From the start, Oxfam has worked to help poor people build a better future. It has organized long-term programmes in developing countries for many years, and these have helped millions of people to escape poverty and disease. For example, Oxfam has provided equipment for communities to get clean water. It has trained thousands of health workers, and these people have improved the health of whole regions. In addition, Oxfam has made many new businesses possible through financial help and training. Recently, with some skills training, a group of women in Bangladesh have built a successful company making hand-made products.
